Primary snoring is a common and burdensome condition that affects both men and women. It has a high prevalence in the general population and is associated with significant comorbidities including hypertension, obesity, and glucose intolerance. Previous genetic association studies have identified polymorphisms in CLCNKB and PLCG2 that confer susceptibility to primary snoring. The aim of this study was to identify a genetic risk factor for primary snoring. Previously identified primary snoring susceptibility genes were sequenced in seven women with primary snoring and in 20 control subjects. Of 3,963 exons that were sequenced, 20 were found to be polymorphic and 1,174 were monomorphic in both subject groups. In the case group, a variant in miR-129-1 (miR-129-1-T>C) was identified. This variant was identified as a single nucleotide polymorphism in dbSNP, and allele-specific polymerase chain reaction amplification of DNA was used to verify the polymorphism in blood samples from an additional 21 case and 19 control subjects. The rate of heterozygosity for this variant was significantly different in cases and controls (chi(2)(1, N = 44) = 8.41; P = 0.003) with ba244e880a
