To evaluate the effectiveness of a posteromedial plate osteotomy technique in skeletally immature dogs with tibial tuberosity syndrome (TTS). Prospective clinical study. Dogs (n=6) with bilateral TTS. An external hinge plate was placed adjacent to the medial edge of the tibial tuberosity via a standard medial parapatellar approach, and positioned with all but a portion of the plate extending through the bone. Dogs were evaluated for lameness at admission (T0) and 1 week (T1), 6 weeks (T2), 1 month (T3), and 2 months (T4) after surgery. Owners were asked to complete questionnaires at T1, T2, and T4 (questionnaire A) and T4 (questionnaire B). Angulation of the plate relative to the articular surface of the tibial tuberosity was measured at T1, T2, and T4. Times to ambulation and hospital discharge were recorded. The principal outcome measure was the functional outcome, defined as improvement of the owner-reported lameness score from T0 to T4. The mean \pm SD angle of the plate relative to the articular surface of the tibial tuberosity was $7.3 \pm 2.8^\circ$ (range, 4°
